For good or evil, a slender Act of Parliament could exterminate in a generation the thoroughbred racehorse in this country. How long would it take to recreate the stock without foreign importation We do not want to depend on importation for our brains and ability, and on this ground alone I would deprecate the tendency to pass by more subtle factors of national deterioration, because they require a little more thought than more strident evils. To emphasize this point I have republished the following letters, although they are controversial in form. The origin of the letters must be sought for in a lecture before the Sanitary Inspectors Association, by Sir James Crichton-Browne. In that lecture he was reported in the Times of August 18, 1905, as saying: Professor Karl Pearson, a thoughtful and cautious anthropologist, had told us that decadence of character and of intelligent leadership was to be noted alike in the British merchant, the professional man, and the workman, and this he attributed to the fact that the intellectual classes were not reproducing their numbers as they did fifty or one hundred years ago. In this view Professor Pearson was supported by the Prime Minister, who said at Cambridge last year that in the case of every man who left the labouring class and became a member of the middle or wealthier classes his progeny were likely to be diminished owing to the fact that marriages were later in that class. He was...
