Splitting begins in the micronucleus and flagellum, then goes on in the macronucleus and finally in the protoplasm. These daughter organisms form large rosettes, in which the flagellar ends form the center, the bodies of the parasites lying at the periphery. The absence of an undulating membrane and the fact that the micronucleus shows no tendency to approach the macronucleus prove this parasite to be no trypanosome. The absence of any flagellated forms in the life history of the piroplasmata appear to disprove Laveran and Mesnil s theory. It is at present doubtful to which, if any, of the protozoal parasites the cause of kala-azar bears the greatest resemblance. No growth took place above 25 C., whilst 15 to 17 C. would seem to be the lowest favorable temperature. No growth occurs in bacterially contaminated media, staphylococci proving most harmful to the parasites. Epidemiological observations had led the author to the supposition that the disease was transferred by some blood-sucking insect. The limitation to houses and the slow spread seemed to suggest the bed-bug as the most likely animal. Even after absorbing full meals of blood, the gastric contents of the bed-bug are distinctly acid; for this reason usually they are found to contain no bacteria. The author...
