Excerpt: . . . decide between acute and chronic disease. I have preserved the urinary sediment from three of these cases, and although the first case occurred nearly fifteen years ago, the tube-casts are as well seen as when the specimen was recent. You may see these specimens under the microscopes on the table, and having carefully inspected them, you may recognise their like when you meet with them in practice. One case was that of a solicitor aged 40, another a merchant aged 56, another a clergyman aged 45. The symptoms and the condition of the urine were alike in all. There was great prostration, vomiting, bleeding at the nose, and in one case from the gums, no dropsy, ultimately a typhoid condition, and unconsciousness shortly before death. The urine was blood-tinged, the specific gravity from 1009 to 1017, moderately albuminous. A rather copious sediment was composed of dark granular and large hyaline...
